

Red Tides and other Blue Issues

communicating the present state of our water systems through art

This pop-up exhibition features work made in Liberal Arts Instructor Jennifer Vreeland-Dawson's Ecology of Water class. Each student has considered the present state of water systems. Pollution of plastics and chemicals are negatively affecting the ecological and physical systems of both our fresh and salt water ecologies. Natural events such as red tides are becoming more frequent and more toxic by human driven activities causing fertilizer runoff and warming waters due to climate change. Students have made the art you see here about various forms of pollution informed by what they have learned in class and by communicating with experts in the scientific community.
